Foreword.

The following is a list of sources of current statistical data. It covers the most important commodities, including a few items such as telephones and buildings. The list is divided into two parts, one giving sources of quantity statistics (production, shipments, stocks, etc.), the other giving sources of price statistics. Within these two parts, the sources are arranged alphabetically by commodities.

The list is preceded by a concise index of the chief agencies which compile business data, and some of the more important publications desirable for any business research library.

The New York University Bureau of Business Research in its work has found there is an enormous mass of statistical information which has been but little used, for the reason that it comes out in current periodicals, which are so numerous and fugitive that few persons are in a position to follow them. Banks, research organizations, and business houses frequently desire to look up the price of some commodity or to ascertain the course of the market for that commodity over a series of years. They are at once confronted with the question as to the most reliable source from which they can get quotations throughout the period which they desire to cover. Or they may desire to ascertain the production, shipments, stocks, exports, imports, and so forth, of some commodity or group of commodities, and not know where to turn for the data. After days or weeks of research, it may be found that no data exist.

It is believed that a carefully compiled list of statistical sources will be of real value, both as giving reliable information and as indicating where there are not at present any available data. It will also save time by indicating the nature of the information contained in the source referred to. The following list shows whether the information is reported by the pound, ton, bushel, bale, or other unit. It shows whether the information given covers a state, a nation, the world, or only some local market. The period of time covered is also indicated. One can also learn for the quantity figures the number of years which can be covered from each source.

In compiling this analytic list of statistical sources, the aim has been to cover the most important commodities. There are hundreds of other commodities which are important in one way or another, but none of them is as important as most of those here given, either from the standpoint of the value of the total output or from the standpoint of wide general use.

No claim is made that all important sources of statistical information concerning the commodities here listed are reported. It has been the object to include none but reliable sources and to give a representative list, which will cover all available data. In order to prevent a needless duplication of sources, the list here given as a rule arbitrarily includes only one of two sources which give the same information and are of equal merit. For example, both "Bradstreet's" and "Dun's" give reliable information and are readily available, but the references we give are only to Bradstreet's. The same may be said with reference to the Journal of Commerce and the New York Commercial.

The aim has been to include publications which give data daily, weekly, and monthly. In some cases, the choice has been controlled by the convenience and general accessibility of the publication.

The names of various commercial and government publications change from time to time. For example, the Department of Agriculture now publishes "Weather Crops and Markets" which includes data formerly appearing in the "Monthly Crop Reporter" and the "Market Reporter". In each case the aim has been to give the name of the publication now current.

In the column which shows the "lag" (the time elapsing between the date of the information and the date of publication), the time shown is approximate, since it depends upon the exigencies of the publisher and the mail service. The lag may actually vary several days from that shown in this list. It is believed, however, that the information given will be useful as furnishing a general indication of the timeliness of the data.

The dates of first publication shown for the statistics of quantity are believed to be approximately accurate in each case. It should be noted, however, that in some instances it has been impossible to secure the information, and in others some uncertainty exists. In a few cases, also, it may be that the exact information carried currently by the publication will not be found in the earlier years-that is, the scope or form of the information may have changed somewhat.

For example, the Government figures on imports and exports were not published monthly until 1866. In previous years they were published annually. The important bulletin now issued by the Department of Agriculture called "Weather Crops and Markets" is the successor to a long line of earlier publications. The statistical reports on condition of crops were published monthly from May, 1863, through December, 1876. These reports were followed by a series of "Special Reports" between January, 1877, and September, 1883. Then came a "New Series" beginning with October, 1883, lasting through December,1897. The "Crop Circular" followed, from May,1898, through April, 1900, when the "Crop Reporter" began and was carried on through June, 1913. Next came the "Agricultural Outlook" from September, 1913, to April, 1915. The "Monthly Crop Report" and the "Monthly Crop Reporter" filled the gap from May, 1915, through December, 1921.

Criticisms and suggestions looking toward the improvement of this list of statistical sources will be welcome.

A List of Sources for Business Data.

The following is a suggestive list of the chief sources to which one may turn for information concerning business and industry. The list is by no means complete, but will be of value as suggesting the ground that may be covered. The inquirer for data is constantly surprised to find how willing various research agencies are to give information. It is especially to be noted that all letters addressed to governmental agencies receive careful attention and generally every effort is made to give the information requested. Even if the request is not directed to the proper department, it will usually be forwarded there by the official who receives it. Many organizations such as telephone companies, banks, and advertising agencies, collect masses of statistical data concerning business and markets.
